

BioHeritage operating principles, values, codes of conduct, and diversity & inclusion policies

Science and research have a major role to play in reversing the decline of our biological heritage. In our 2019-2024 strategy we sharpen the focus on how New Zealand's research and innovation system can connect and accelerate progress to deliver enduring impact and benefit for New Zealand.

Operating Principles

- Maintaining a strategic perspective across all relevant investments (while not seeking to 'control' the direction of investments), thereby identifying gaps where investment is needed;
- Applying a right team approach at the outset, with a focus on inclusion of new participants who bring fresh perspectives and passion to the mission, as well as a healthy combination of Te Ao Māori and western science;
- Taking a 'whole-system' view across an innovation pathway;
- Facilitating inclusion of independent initiatives so they become part of a coordinated national effort, even when funded from other sources;
- Ensuring such coordinated national effort is informed across all priority setting initiatives;
- Purposefully balancing urgent/immediate deliverables with longer-term, strategic investments;
- Capturing and using key learnings and knowledge from national and international research;
- Investing in Mātauranga Māori-led solutions – and resourcing them adequately – acknowledging that there has been relative under-investment in uncovering indigenous ecological knowledge despite clear demonstration of the benefits of this approach;
- Ensuring current investments and outcomes of previous investments are open, transparent and publicly available (with due regard to commercially sensitive information), to prevent duplication of research effort and ensure investment is targeted to high-priority research;
- Capturing and sharing knowledge and learnings with everyone.
